

Most Hospice Teams Are Not Failing. They Are Drifting.

And the cost shows up in patients who never got the call, referral sources who quietly moved on, and leaders who ran out of ways to explain why the numbers look the way they do.

WHY THIS MATTERS

The hardest thing about inconsistent sales execution in hospice is that it is invisible until it is not. Nobody on your team is showing up with bad intentions. Most of your people genuinely care. They understand the mission. They know what hospice means to families. And yet, somewhere between the mission and the field, something gets lost.

Conversations stay surface level. Relationships with referral sources feel transactional. Follow-through drifts. The playbook, if there is one, exists in someone's head and not in a format anyone can coach from. Leaders find themselves reviewing the same numbers week after week without a clear way to move them.

This is not a motivation problem. It is a structure problem. And it is the most common pattern in hospice organizations that are otherwise doing everything right.

WHY IT CANNOT WAIT

Every week without a defined system is a week where capable people are working hard without a clear target. Referral sources form impressions quickly. A liaison who shows up without clear purpose, cannot connect their visit to a patient's clinical need, or follows up inconsistently does not get a second chance to make that relationship feel different.

Markets tighten. Competitors build presence. Organizations that are still figuring out their field strategy in year three are not just behind — they are building habits that become significantly harder to correct later.

Leadership strain compounds this. Managers without a real coaching structure spend their energy on outcomes they cannot change instead of behaviors they can. That gap — between what leaders see in the data and what they are able to do about it — is where census growth stalls and good people burn out.

The cost of waiting is not dramatic. It is slow.
And that is exactly what makes it so expensive.

HOW SPARTAN COACHING HELPS

Spartan Coaching was built specifically for hospice. Not adapted from a general sales training model. Not borrowed from another industry. Built from real experience in hospice markets, with real referral sources, in real conversations.

The work is practical and specific. It helps good people perform at a consistently high level and gives leaders the tools to coach that performance rather than just measure it.

- Building visit planning and territory strategy that liaisons can actually execute week to week — not just review in a meeting.
- Developing messaging frameworks grounded in patient eligibility and clinical relevance, not product language that pushes referral sources away.
- Creating accountability structures that leaders can coach from, so performance conversations lead somewhere instead of repeating themselves.
- Developing sales managers who understand their people well enough to coach the person, not just the pipeline.
- Providing strategic guidance on market positioning, team structure, and growth execution for multi-territory organizations.

This is not training delivered and forgotten. It is practical, ongoing support that stays grounded in what is actually happening in your markets.

WHAT WE OFFER

Every engagement is built around your organization's actual situation — not a standardized curriculum.

Individual Rep Coaching One-on-one sessions, field ride-alongs, and territory strategy for liaisons ready to stop guessing and start executing consistently.	Sales Leadership Development Coaching and workshops for directors who need to build real coaching habits — not just review weekly activity reports.
Team Training & Workshops Structured training on messaging, referral engagement, visit planning, and field accountability for the full sales team.	Corporate & Multi-Market Consulting Strategic consulting for organizations scaling across markets — team structure, performance systems, and growth planning.

Spartan Coaching also offers custom technology solutions including CRM development, iOS field applications, and websites built specifically for hospice provider workflows.

Ready to have a real conversation?

There is no pitch. No obligation. Just an honest thirty minutes to understand where your team is and whether working together makes sense for both sides.

spartancoaching.com/contact

Nick Lynch · Spartan Coaching